On a recent business trip, I ducked into the hotel gift shop in between meetings to grab some energy food. Approaching the counter, I put down my purchase, handed the clerk what I thought was a twenty-dollar bill and said, "Here's twenty dollars." When the teller at my bank had handed me the bill shortly before I left for the airport, he had assured me it was a $20 bill, and I had folded it accordingly and placed it in my billfold in the compartment set aside for that denomination of bills. Therefore, I was surprised when the clerk said, "No, that's a $5. Here's your change." I protested that I had given her twenty dollars, but she said I had not. I explained that I had been told at the bank that it was $20, but she didn't care. Who was right? Since my purchase cost only $1.50, I cared how this question was answered. In this particular case, it happened that a colleague who could see was behind me in line and witnessed the transaction. She spoke up and said, "I saw her hand you a twenty-dollar bill, Ma'am." At that point, the clerk opened the drawer of the cash register, took out some additional bills, and slapped them on the counter in front of me. I picked up the bills, took my purchase, and left the store. Though such incidents are not common, they do occur more often for people who are blind than many might like to admit. The incident described
